A QUIET NIGHT

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 26, 7 a m Dr Bliss says the president passed a comfortable night, resting well sleeping at intervals till 4 a m About 3 o clock a rise in temperature was noticed but it soon passed away, and afterwards the president obtained more rest and sleep This morning at 7 o clock he is resting quietly with his pulse at 98, and temperature apparently about normal

RUMORS OF A CHILL

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 26, 11 10 a m—The president is resting comfortably and the surgeons express themselves as satisfied with his present condition A rumor was circulated that the president had had another chill this morning These who are thoroughly acquainted with the facts however deny the story, and say the patient had no chills subsequent to those which occurred previous to the incision Dr Agnew has been here all the morning

HAMMOND'S DISCOURAGING OPINION

NEW YORK, July 26—All sorts of alarming rumors concerning the president's condition are flying about today, and great anxiety is felt throughout the city The crowds around the bulletin boards have greatly increased and the people have a depressed look The associated press dispatches up to this time, 2 p m, do not contain the discouraging reports Dr Hammond expresses the belief that the president already has pyæmia

ANOTHER OPERATION

CHICAGO, July 26—The Inter-Ocean's Washington special says Another operation was performed on the president by Dr Agnew this morning A piece of the fractured eleventh rib and one or two small pieces of bone were cut away The operation was made through the incision cut Saturday The unfavorable symptoms last night and this morning are said by the doctors to be the irritation of the wound by particles of bone in it

CONFIDENCE STILL STRONG

NEW YORK, July 26—A private dispatch from General Boynton, regarding the president's prospects this morning, says I think the chances are as good as last week at this time, except the loss of strength, my confidence is still very strong"

NO EVIDENCES WHATEVER OF PYÆMIA

NEW YORK, July 26—The Post interview says Dr Hamilton also said "The deposit of pus which caused the recent trouble would have been opened by the attending physicians but they thought it was a responsible duty and they sent for Agnew and him This complication does not affect the chance of recovery very materially, and though similar obstacles may ensue there is no cause for serious alarm These pus pouches are not likely to occur along the track of the wound The special cause of this was the projection of a fractured rib The presumption seems to be from certain indications that the ball lies in the right iliac fossa or cavity between the front of the hip bone and the ribs which contain the small intestines I do not think it entered the peritoneum or the liver although at first it seemed certain it had Every expedient will be used to disinfect the pus in the wound and render it innocuous I still think the chances of recovery are more than equal, more especially since I have had an opportunity of seeing him" These are Dr Hamilton's exact words The president is not so much changed as many patients would be under the same circumstances The stories of his weakness are groundless He could bear a dozen or more operations like the first which was likely to move, about There is no evidence whatever of pyæmia

"Which Board of Trade" Was It?

DENVER, Col, July 26—At the meeting of the Board of Trade to-night, largely attended by business men, it was agreed that the Board of Trade should appoint a committee, consisting of members of the board and other citizens to solicit subscriptions for the purpose of putting speakers in the field to discuss the capital in the interest of Denver

IN PERIL BEFORE.

Garfield Said to Have Been Selected for Assassination in 1878

CHICAGO July 26—The correspondent of the Cleveland Leader gives currency to a story alleged to be well authenticated that Garfield was once before in peril of his life from assassination When a member of the electoral commission in 1876, a plot to kill him or blow him up was unearthed, and a body guard escorted him to and from their houses through a hostile Louisiana set of roughs, who once made a break for them but were deterred by the ready presentation of clubs and revolvers Chas S. Draper, who after 18 years service was discharged from the position of deputy sergeant-at-arms of the gate had charge of the guard and can verify the facts, as can several other gentlemen The idea of these ruffians and their prompters was that with Garfield or Hoar out of the way the democratic house would reverse the 8 to 7 character of the commission

WRINGING GUITEAU

He Fears for His Own Life, Yet Hopes the President Will Die

CHICAGO, July 26—The Tribune's Washington special says Bailey, who is Corkhill's stenographer, and sees more of Guiteau than any body else, says he still says whenever he has opportunity that he hopes the president will die If, however, his act has restored harmony in the republican party he feels that his mission has been sufficiently successful He has a very bulky mass of short hand manuscript, parts of which will be written out by the time of the trial A great part of it consists of autobiographical statements by Guiteau, whose vanity has prompted him to give very full accounts of his life. He keeps his health very well though showing signs of continued imprisonment, his treatment has not been altered from the first He is confined in a cell with no communication with the world The keepers are under strict orders to say nothing to him beyond what is necessary He is not all anxious to have greater liberty He seems to be afraid that his person is in danger, and could hardly be induced to go to the warden's office the other day to get better facilities for ablution lest it might be a ruse to get him into the hands of the populace

FALSE SYMPATHY

CHICAGO, July 26—A Tribune editorial says the protest which Senator Hoar has recently made against District Attorney Corkhill's treatment of Guiteau, has given a clue to the sentimentalist, who in case of the president's recovery, will undoubtedly endeavor to work up sympathy for the dead beat scoundrel, who crowned his worthless career with an attempt on the president's life

HUNG BY MOB

Lewis' Murderer Strung Up Unceremoniously.

SANTA FE, July 26—The New Mexican will to-morrow contain the following account of the lynching which occurred in Rio Arriba county several days ago A man in from Rio Arriba reports that the man mentioned in yesterday's issue as having been hung at Tierra Amarilla, several days ago was J L Jennings who murdered a man named Lewis in order to get possession of the latter's wife The crime of Jennings is the most atrocious one and deserved the punishment he received at the hands of a mob at Tierra Amarilla, though it was to be regretted that he did not die according to forms of the law The deceased had just been taken from Farmington to the county seat and was strung up on the first night after his arrival With the exception of this case of violence Rio Arriba county has been quiet for some time, being freed from the Allison and Stockton gangs, and is likely to remain so

Stocks Very Dull

NEW YORK, July 26—The Post's financial article says, the fluctuating stock market is dull and heavy Prices this morning were dull generally, the exceptions being a trifling advance in Consolidated Virginia, State Line No 2 and there was a corresponding decline in Alta, Montana Mariposa, Rising Sun Spring Valley The sales at this mining exchanges during the week show a heavy decline on the active weeks of last spring when sales ranged between 1,000 000 and 1,200,000, while at the present time they reach only about 600,000 shares per week

IN MEMORIAM.

Obsequies of the Late Dean Stanley.

Princes, Prelates and Men of Letters Honor His Memory.

SERVICES AT THE ABBEY

LONDON, July 26—Although 3 o clock this afternoon was the time appointed for the opening of Westminster abbey for the funeral of Dean Stanley the crowd began to assemble at noon By 2 o clock fully twice as many persons had assembled as could possibly be accommodated The Prince of Wales and other members of the royal family were especially represented Matthew Arnold, the eminent writer the Right Hon William Henry Smith, Bishop of Exeter, Right Hon William E Forster and the Duke of Westminster were among the pall bearers The Archbishop of Canterbury presided at the grave The funeral was the occasion of a remarkable gathering Among those present at the abbey were Professors Huxley and Tyndall, Rev Dr Newman Hall, Cardinal Manning, Lord Shaftsbury the bishops of Tennessee Peterborough St Albans, Gloucester and other prominent clergymen the Dukes of Argyle and Richmond the Marquis of Salisbury, Lords Derby Aberdeen and Sherbrook Gladstone, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir Ashton Cross Rt Hon Lyon Playfair and Lord Houghton and Baroness Burdett Coutts

ADDITIONAL PARTICULARS

NEW YORK, July 26—The following are additional details of Dean Stanley's funeral Never since the burial of Livingstone has Westminster Abbey presented such an imposing spectacle as to-day when Dean Stanley was laid in his final resting place The interment took place in the Henry VII chapel, near the Grave of Montpensier The inscription on the coffin plate was

THE VERY REVEREND
ARTHUR PENRYHN STANLEY,
Second Son of the Reverend
ARTHUR STANLEY,
Bishop of Norwich
Born 1 th of December 1815, died 18th of July 1881

At the head of the coffin was a black satin cushion, bearing the insignia, "Worn by the Dean of the Order of Bath" Resting upon a black pall, with a border of white satin silk was a wreath of immortelles sent as a tribute of grateful and affectionate remembrance" by the crown princess of Germany There were also wreaths and crosses from the Prince and Princess of Wales, Princess Beatrice, the Duchess of Limburg and Prince Leopold There were tokens of respect and affection from all countries in Europe and also beautiful wreaths from many well known Americans A white floral cross on a purple velvet ground was sent by Americans

The esteem in which the memory of the dean will ever be held by Americans was well expressed by Dr Dudley, assistant bishop of Kentucky, in St Margarets, adjoining the Abbey, yesterday afternoon He said he had come as a foreigner to speak words of kindly remembrance of him whom they all mourned and who was one of the most talented men of this generation He was never even privileged to grasp his hand or to look into his eyes, but he came with the sweet memory that one of the last letters that the Dean ever wrote was one inviting him, a stranger, to his ever open house and to kneel beside him in the Abbey More than that, he came as an American to speak of him as one who labored to bring closer and closer together the men and women of the two nations of common lineage and common language

GOULD'S PLANS.

Moving to Get Control of the Texas Pacific.

ST LOUIS, July 26—The Republican's Marshall special says It is reported that Governor Brown has filed his resignation as vice president of the Texas Pacific railroad, that it will be received in a short time, and that he will be appointed solicitor of all Gould's roads

A dispatch from Greenville to-day says it is now asserted that Jay Gould will change the East Line & Red River narrow gauge railroad, recently acquired by him, to a broad gauge line and extend to Dallas This road runs in between and parallel to the trans-continental main line of the Texas Pacific, and when completed to Dallas will be 200 miles long It is said that Gould's object in changing its gauge is so as to enable him to get more exclusive control of the Texas Pacific by threatening to construct a competing line to the Pacific coast, using the East Line & Red River road as a nucleus to be operated with the Iron Mountain road

INVESTIGATING THE MINT.

Certain Crooked Transactions at San Francisco Under Examination.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 26—In the investigation of the affairs of the mint, the taking of testimony commenced to-day Blanchard, as counsel for Page announced that he was ready to proceed to make the fourth charge, that the administration of Dodge received bullion at 900 fine and remitted charges of deductions, that bullion known as Northern Belle was received from the Anglo Californian bank and that it was unfair for assaying and refining at a loss to the government, that his attention was called to the quality of the bullion and that he neglected to remedy the evil. That his action was in the interest of depositors at a great loss to the government, that the losses to the government in the manipulation of silver bullion have been unusual and extraordinary, and that bullion has been stolen and while some of the thieves were prosecuted others were allowed to resign and such facts were not reported to the proper authorities

Hodge was sworn and testified that he had no control of the melter and refiner of the mint They receive the commissions the same as myself The assayer determines the character of the bullion and fixes the charges My instructions are not to receive bullion below 900 fine These instructions were received a year ago, before that we took bullion as low as 500 fine

The melter and refiner did not object to receiving bullion below the standard The depositors paid the parting and refining charges They made no deduction to save the government from loss as none was necessary The law did not require it The doors in parting and refining were unavoidable Probably they would not have been opened had the deductions been made The Anglo Californian bank had deposited other than the Northern Belle bullion The latter is fit for coining and employees did not complain of this class of bullion Mr Law of the Anglo Californian Bank has never been to see me regarding the Northern Belle bullion He had allowed an employee to resign against whom there were suspicions of misconduct It was done as a precaution There were no just grounds for suspicion on my part

BREAK IN ALBION.

Stock Dealers Worried Over a Fall in Mining Shares.

SAN FRANCISCO July 26—The street abounded to-day with rumors to account for the drop in Albion stock Some out to the effect that Judge Rives had dropped an expression to the effect that the St George patent is unassailable others hinting at the unlimited use of money by the Richmond company Both press and private telegrams from Eureka are to the effect that nothing is certain, the decision of the court has leaked out that the decision need not be looked for till to-morrow and that no cause is known there for the break

A later Eureka Nev dispatch says that Judge Rives decision in the Richmond Albion case will be delivered at 10 o clock to-morrow Your correspondent is able to give its salient points in advance He, the judge, holds the St George patent to be absolutely void The Uncle Sam claim is a good and valid location and in fact every point contended for by the Albion as between the St George patent and the Uncle Sam location is found in favor of the Albion but among its paper titles put by in the Richmond case was a patent called the Victoria This patent was procured by Richmond pending the protest suit between St George and the Uncle Sam The Victoria claim lies to the northward and there was no surface conflict between it and the Uncle Sam hence no protest against the issuance of the Victoria patent was made The Victoria having gone through without protest the judge holds that it is a better title than that conferred by the prior application A stay of proceedings will be granted for thirty or sixty days to allow the case to be taken up and prevent the destruction of the estate by either party The decision occupies thirty pages of legal cap

AWAY DOWN SOUTH.

Incidents of Travel from Socorro to Albuquerque.

Some of the Experiences and Observations of a Lady Tourist.

From an occasional correspondent of the GAZETTE

Much of the journey up the Rio Grande valley by wagon road is, though tedious, highly entertaining. Because of the sea of sand to be traversed, five miles a day is considered good progress It is however, far from cheering to the traveler, who is called upon to pitch his tent in this weary desert The dread of waking if he sleeps at all to find his house blown over, because not founded upon a rock, adds nothing to his peace of mind An occasional Mexican plunging through the sand deeps on horseback, affords temporary relief to the monotony for miles continuous With the encouraging refrain adelante, bad sand, even he disappears from view.

In contrast with the many squalid adobe towns on the way to Albuquerque, one or two deserve notice for their neat and thrifty appearance Bellamonte, and Bernalillo twenty miles from the city, are quite attractive At the latter place a few imposing dwellings, not be but two-storied, indicate the homes of well to-do Americans

Camping on night among sand hills, the heads of two or three Indians peering over the summit of one of the largest of the hills proved a fitting close of the next day's experience

On the morrow, our party dined in full view of the Pueblo Indian town, Isleta At that distance eager imaginations pictured it as something wildly romantic and worthy a closer inspection What was my disappointment to find it even more irregular and squalid than the worst Mexican settlement yet beheld Our driver certainly piloted us through either by instinct or pure luck, as there was literally no street or passage to lead the way We squirmed in and out among the dirty houses, ignorant of where we were coming out, or what we might unwittingly get into All the squaws, old Indians and children emerged with mysterious suddenness like ants from a disturbed ant hill, as we passed along The older ones, ornamented with bright, and many colored belts and bandannas, chose the most commanding situations for an unobstructed view standing with arms akimbo till our majestic mule team disappeared from sight The limbs of the children were closely bandaged from knee to toe with strips of strong white cotton cloth A band of these juveniles rushed boldly upon the rear of our wagon, to undo some articles suspended by wire The sensation of a good blacksnake, vigorously applied to hands and faces, from the front, soon dispersed them however, without damage to our private property Had we been in less haste to get on, we might have felt flattered by the marked attentions bestowed upon us As it was our reflections were more cheerful upon reaching the free open country on the other side

The same afternoon we rode through an essentially mountainous region in the face of a coming thunder storm In the west, one immense dark colored spur stretched along for miles and miles, ending in a dizzy, pointed cliff way up among the clouds Not stopping to ask whether history would support the assertion, we saw on the surface of this lofty cliff, what we dared call the ruins of an ancient building or buildings From a high plateau we looked down into the western valley, upon the beautiful Indian town, San Philippi The dark spur just mentioned formed the background against which the village nestled close The most prominent feature was a massive adobe church with a clumsy, mound like dome Next the church was a broad, flat structure, scarce a man's height Its object could not be divined, though it resembled a sort of forum The houses looked neat and regular, the whole breathing an air of antiquity The tones of a peculiar sounding bell, like the notes produced by the alternate strokes on two tin pans of different key mingled with the shouts of the Indians, came to our ears from below The shadow of the black rain clouds added to the naturally weird and gloomy appearance of the town Happy the artist who, either with camera or brush, could do justice to this picture as we saw it

At length we find ourselves at the Albuquerque ferry, the best crossing of the kind on the river A former experience at the mercy of the shifting quicksands of this much to be dreaded and treacherous stream, render the thought of even such a mode of transportation anything but tranquilizing After much waiting and wondering I see the struggling attendants of the boats assembled, and still I wait scarce I know why Presently little heaps of shoes and stockings—begin to appear here and there along the shore Can this be magic? Have these shoes and stockings grown like mushrooms under our very gaze? Still unsettled on this point my bewilderment is increased tenfold by an attack of insanity, which seems all at once to have overtaken the Mexicans They are evidently laboring under the delusion that they are in their own private dressing rooms, for the scenes change in rapid succession, till they all stand before us in tights as if ready for the trapeze or circus horse Unwilling to be detained by any acrobatic performances, I look about for some means of escape. Finally rows of drying garments on neighboring boat railings suggest the possibility—that all these proceedings may form part of the general programme, and sure enough the dusky faced boatmen soon launch us forth—some remaining on board to—guide—the craft with oars and poles, some wading in to feel the way, pulling the immense boat this way and that, according to the shifting of the sand Once zigzagged across, a terrible howl like cries of murmuring demons ascends from the eight or ten throats behind us It continues until solid footing is gained some yards from the bank Then, happily, the cry bueno, all right, recalls to mind that instead of crossing some dismal stream of the lower regions we have just reached the eastern bank of the Big river of the Mexicans and are in the suburbs of one of their big cities

A brief visit shows Albuquerque to be a lively town of business Enough buildings have been modernized by means of porches and additional stories to tone down the rough, martistic appearance of the place in a great degree A few impressed me as wholly American in design

Either a Mexican funeral or other important religious service was in progress that day The long procession still pouring in from the country affords an excellent opportunity for observation, which was well rewarded For, of the señors and señoritas, a large proportion tripped along with a show of pride and satisfaction at being in neat dresses and bonnets, conforming to American style What a relief from the full ungraceful skirts, and black shawl always thrown cornerwise over the heads of the weaker in most parts of the territory All modes of locomotion were represented, from walking, to riding in fine carriages In short, the general appearance of this mixed procession, gave evidence of considerable wealth and taste among the natives of Albuquerque and vicinity This advance from the semi barbarous dress and manners of the old Mexicans, not only affords a more pleasing sight to the eye, but is an important fact in view of the growth of that better civilization hoped for by the Americans gradually settling in their midst.

R. W. STELLE,
Manager of the Gazette.

No thing is heard from ex-Senator Platt.

There is not much resignation about Mr. Conkling's resignation.

Business men of Denver don't propose to help the business of other cities at their own expense.

The Denver board of trade accepted the suggestion of the Inter-Ocean in preference to all others.

There are now left but two men of the following names: Cameron, Davis, Hill, Jones and Miller.

Everybody is pleased at the result in New York but wonder how it was possible to find two such ordinary men.

The latest reports are all favorable to the president's recovery. The earnest desire of the entire people will not be disappointed.

The secret agent's kaleidoscopic arguments at different points show the danger of having any of the speeches of the orators printed.

Senator Conkling is out of business. We suggest the board of trade of Denver employ him to stump the state. He would draw well.

Saturday a contract was let for grading fifteen miles more of the road up the Pass. This will grade the road beyond the Junction house.

Which board of trade was it? One of them is a liquor store and gambling house. These places are anxious to have the capital at Denver.

For ten days past the Denver papers have been full of frantic sort of articles on the capital question. They see now their absurdity, and are trying to appear indifferent.

The Chieftain takes a much more dignified position on the capital question than the Denver papers. It sees that the capital is in no way essential to its prosperity.

It is rumored that Governor Evans and ex-Senator Chaffee will be in the next Arapahoe county convention. This will make it a distinguished body. These gentlemen have not yet been elected however.

Ex-Senator Conkling will now have an opportunity to show his devotion to the republican cause. There will be active campaigns in several states, and he has no excuse. It will be a good test of his unselfish regard for the republican part.

Since Pueblo and Denver are to be the commercial centers it will be a good compromise to put the capital between, at Colorado Springs. It will be nearer the northern part of the state than Pueblo, and nearer the southern part than Denver.

The Denver board of trade have finally taken action. It has decided to send out speakers. These speeches will be looked for with impatience. The tongued orators will be welcomed south of the Divide. We really would like to see how much audacity they have in presenting the claims of Denver.

The Herald says the way to defeat a nomination is to send dispatches to Washington declaring the appointment would be a disgrace to the state. This is quite true as a recent contest showed. They defeated a man endorsed by the senior senator, representative in congress, governor and the rest of the state officers except the attorney general, members of the supreme court, besides the department he would have served. His only opponent was one man in Washington armed with with these dispatches.

Dr. Hammond has been trying to get newspaper notoriety since President Garfield was shot. He acts as though the intelligence of the entire profession centered in himself. The ablest surgeons in the country are now treating the president. They have had the most extended experience in gun shot wounds. They say, after a careful examination, there are no symptoms of blood poisoning. Dr. Hammond, who has not seen the patient, differs with them. He entirely over-estimates the value of his opinions.

The reports of the railroad operations in 1880 are extremely interesting. The year has been full of important railway operations. More miles of road were built than in any year since 1873. New combinations have been made which have made bankrupt roads profitable. Rates have been greatly reduced with the rapid increase in business. The reduction in rates in the west have not been as great as in the east. But increase in business and more corporations will soon reduce the rates. To-day a barrel of flour is carried from Chicago to New York for about 75 cents or scarcely more than the cartage would be in a city. The statistics of railroads are now the best arguments against railroad legislation. They show that the natural laws of competition are reducing rates beyond what was attempted by legislation. The abundance of through lines east of the Missouri prevents any high tariff even when pooling arrangements are in force.

DENVER'S DEEP DESIGNS

Cappers for the Capital Pervading the Country

THIRD LETTER.

The Secret Agent appeared to be in an especially happy frame of mind as he lolled back in his seat and the train rolled out of the Pueblo depot. He chuckled merrily to himself and wagged his head knowingly. The Gazette reporter who had assumed the disguise of a Cañon City coal miner sat in a seat across the aisle and watched every motion of the mysterious figure in question. Nothing of especial note took place for some time. The Secret Agent true to the Denver principle of trying to get something for nothing, bought a prize package of the train boy and opened it with all the eagerness of a man who confidently expected to find a grand piano or a four story Castle Rock stone house enclosed. His search revealed a very plain brass ring. He made a remark common to Denver men when some other fellow shouts 'Kano!' He examined the ring, however, with the eye of a connoisseur. He was evidently very familiar with rings. After contemplating it for some time he threw it out of the window. He knew his own character well enough to be assured that he required no more brass.

Suddenly he made an exclamation as though he had forgotten something and began fumbling in his pockets, and at length fished out a sealed letter from among a mass of papers. Tearing off the envelope, which he threw upon the floor, he began to read. The envelope bore the Denver postmark, and was evidently a communication to the Secret Agent from headquarters. The reporter slipped into the vacant seat behind the Agent and glanced over his shoulder and read:

OFFICE OF THE SECRET SERVICE,
Denver, July 24th.

Dear Sir:

Our Colorado Springs resident inspector of the Secret Service telegraphed us yesterday that your work in that one-horse town was in the main satisfactory. He says there has been a great revulsion of feeling there, and that the people are talking strongly of selling the ten acre lot on Cascade avenue presented for capitol grounds by the Colorado Springs company, and adding the proceeds to the $5,000 voted by the last legislature for the improvement of the capitol site at Denver. It will be devoted to the purchase of statuary. The only trouble is to determine what prominent citizen of Colorado shall be immortalized in marble or in bronze.

We mention these matters merely to show that your work is beginning to be felt, and we have only one instruction to impress upon your mind, and that is, in all your labors follow our paraphrased rendering of the inscription on the cliff described by Emerson, viz:

Be checky by checky, be checky, checky, but not too checky.' Yours truly,

THE COMMITTEE.

After reading this flattering commendation the secret agent actually glowed with satisfaction, and fondled that portion of his face just in front of his ears with evident pride.

Just before Cañon City was reached the agent opened his traveling bag and made some slight change in his dress. When he disembarked the reporter observed that he was attired much the same as at Pueblo, but he wore a striped blood and white necktie. The reporter breakfasted on in advance, and was ready to receive the agent at one of the most popular street corners in Cañon City. The conversation was opened as usual by the manufacturer of public opinion who exclaimed:

'Grand town you've got here. Some of the noblest scenery in the state. Then observing the coal miner garb in which the reporter was dressed, he continued: 'Abundance of coal here, and the best coal, too, in the state.'

'You're right there, stranger,' replied the reporter.

'How do your people feel down here about the capital question?'

'We are all united on two things.

First, That the capital should be south of the Divide.

Second, That Cañon City is by far the best site for it.'

'There is no doubt about the soundness of your position, looking at it from your point of view,' replied the agent. 'But there are other considerations to be taken into account. The matter is one of state interest. It is a broad cosmopolitan question. Individual claims and individual wishes must be sunk for the general good, as Miss Evans justly remarks in that wonderful story Mareena, 'the microcosm must be sunk in the macrocosm, and the segregation absorbed in the boundless choral aggregation,' which being properly applied means that the capital should go to Denver, for where is there a more boundless aggregation than Denver?'

"Nowhere!" exclaimed the reporter.

"Then it follows logically that the capital should be added to the boundless choral aggregation, don't it?"

'Perhaps so,' dubiously replied one of the crowd which had assembled to listen to the agent's eloquence, 'but it sounds a good deal like a circus advertisement.'

"The general idea is," explained the agent, 'that individuals should sacrifice themselves to the common good and this is especially the case when individuals are under the obligations of favors conferred.'

'Favors?'

'Yes, think how much Cañon City owes to Denver. Think how generously she came to your rescue when the management of the penitentiary was attacked. How she strained every nerve to show the falseness of the charges and how rejoiced she was when they were proved false."

"Denver was very kind."

'Of course she was. Then in addition Denver is one of the most generous contributors to the population of your penitentiary. Every term of court she sends down a large delegation of convicts. These convicts eat, and the purchase of provisions for them makes business lively. It would be no more than right that Cañon City should send Denver a few legislators in return for so many convicts. You know a fair exchange is no robbery."

'But Denver seems to want everything,' remarked a bystander.

'Now, I call that very ungrateful,' exclaimed the Agent, 'just look at your Grand Cañon of the Arkansas! Did Denver ever ask you for that? No, sir. Denver is too generous even to hint at such a thing; and then you have the Arkansas river, while Denver must be content with the Platte and Cherry creek. Did Denver ever connect a scheme to turn the course of the Arkansas so that it should flow into the Platte? Of course not. She rejoices in your success, and all she wants is to have the capital placed where it will do the most good.

This argument seemed to convince the crowd, which immediately dispersed. The manufacturer of public opinion then sought a new audience and continued his good work with great diligence. He observed the rules given him by his superiors with great exactness, and the latter saw and smiled approvingly.

The reporter met the agent later in the afternoon and was greeted cordially with the remark:

'Shall I see you this evening?'

'No, this evening. Some other evening.'

"Good evening."

'Good evening.'

But for all that when the agent boarded the train for Leadville he was not alone, the Gazette villain still pursued him. What happened at Leadville will be related next Thursday.

PLUCKY MISS GRISWOLD

How Bret Harte's Boy Finally Secured the Prize, Despite the Paris Conservatoire and Mme. Ambroise Thomas, in a Brilliant Debut as Ophelia.

New York World.

PARIS, July 8.—The new American prima donna who has come out during my absence from Paris has a wonderful voice, a soprano sign, but her voice is not the subject of the letter. There is something far more wonderful in her, and it rises from obscurity and social student life to the highest place in her profession. She is now simply Ophelia in Ambroise Thomas' opera of Hamlet, and is to sing Catherine in Coppelia in April. I say more—for there is nothing harder in modern opera than these parts. The mere fact that Miss Griswold is doing them then may be considered conclusive as to the qualities of her voice. But the qualities that interest me more in her are those of her strong character, her energy, persistence and courage. Young as she is, her history might form the opening chapter of a new Plutarch on women.

Family misfortunes, I believe, led Miss Griswold to think of the operatic stage. Her father had been wealthy, but there came a time when those he left behind him had to provide for themselves. She came straight to Paris with her mother, entered at the Conservatoire and for years went steadily through the hard work there by which nature's gift of voice is turned into art's masterpiece—a prima donna for the opera. The daily life at the Conservatoire is in itself no mean trial for a person reared in luxury. There is poor provision of everything except of good teaching. The classrooms are bare and miserable. There is no ventilation. It is a forcing house for stage hydrophobia. The French are ready to welcome foreigners to this university of the lyric and dramatic arts, but, to tell the plain truth, they do not like to see the foreigners coming out first. They would rather have them take the smaller parts and form a sort of setting for the gem of native genius. Miss Griswold, however, showed a very strong determination to be the gem and not the setting, and there came a time in one of the periodical competitions when they had to decide either to give her the first prize or to commit an act of favoritism for the benefit of a French girl. They decided for the act of favoritism, and Miss Griswold, who as the phrase goes, had sung the head off her rival, was offered an inferior award. She would not take it. The whole Conservatoire was in amazement. The thing went beyond the walls of the boulevard, and Paris settled down with a complacent smile to see the row. What would become of this audacious young American miss, who had beaded the very examiners on whose favor all her future hung? The examiners were for the moment the only persons who took it quietly, being, as it were, struck dumb by the rashness of the act. Before they could recover themselves the courageous young creature was made to feel through the kindly counsel of friends that she had gone a little too far, and she consented to hold out her hand for the prize, which she did not earnest. The grim ones, being not wholly wanting in a sense of the ridiculous, were glad to be out of it on these terms, and there was peace once more in the land. Then Miss Griswold went back to work for that first prize. Once more the revolving year brought the dread conclave together in that queer little theater at the Conservatoire which is only not pulled down because the architects despair of a second stroke of luck equal to the first which gave the place its magical acoustic. Ambroise Thomas sat in the president's chair, and other musicians of distinction were to the right and left of him. One candidate after another came before them to warble for honors and more than one, I assure you, succeeded in nothing but the quaver. Miss Griswold's prize essay was the jewel scene from Faust, and when she had handed it in in the form of a flood of lark like melody there was no question as to the name of the winner. The unwonted tumult among their unusually serene highnesses of the musical world was decisive on this point. A week after she was engaged at the Grand Opera to make her debut in Ambroise Thomas' greatest work.

But this was only the beginning of a new set of difficulties. Miss Griswold was engaged, but she soon had reason to fear that this had been done not with a view of bringing her out, but rather of keeping her in. Her salary was to be mere hush money. The truth is, the irruption of this Fair Barbarian into the classic land of art had excited the liveliest jealousy of another lady whose word was law at the opera. Week after week passed and nothing was said about the debut, and as the weeks lengthened into months Miss Griswold's chances of achieving the distinction for which she had toiled and waited so patiently, seemed more remote than ever. It was the time for decisive measures, and this delicate girl was just the one to take them. One morning she called with her mother on M. Vaucorbeil, the director of the great house, who is really about as awful a person to face as a minister of state, and coolly requested him to accept her resignation. 'But why?' said the amazed M. Vaucorbeil. 'Monsieur, I do not care to be paid for doing nothing. I must make my debut, and I begin to fear that I am never to make it here.' The director took time to consider his answer, and it was a terrible one when it came—within a week she was to make her debut.

Was the issue to be an awful warning to malcontent young ladies or an awful warning to jealous old ones? Of course the debutante was cruelly agitated. It was inevitable according to all the precedents. He was within sight of the goal. From the moment of that 'call' to the night of her appearance she simply never once closed her eyes, but kept perfectly wakeful through dark and light with the dark hours of feverish brooding on that coming trial. She saw no one but her relations, shutting herself up with her mute score, with her apprehensions of failure and with her grim determination to succeed, and letting the two last fight it out between them whenever a pause in the music gave them time. At last came the night of destiny. The great opera house was, I dare say, about the same to most people as on other nights, but what a hall of the Areopagus, a secret sessions house of the Council of Ten, a star chamber and a supreme court of inquisition in one it must have seemed to her. Critics in the pit, society in the boxes, the colony everywhere and outside of all their worships the French public, without a single prejudice in her favor, to angle to do them justice, with an hour to deliberate in to let her win if she could. Then came the awful moment when the great curtain rolled up, and when her mother sent her—with what invocations for aid it would be hardly becoming to mention—then the wings to the stage. What passed then for the next quarter of an hour all but one person could tell you, and that one is Miss Griswold. She only knows that as she sang her voice seemed to belong to another, so strangely unconscious was she of any effort of will in making it heard, and then she ran off with the delirious conviction that she had failed to please, and that her whole life scheme was a miserable wreck. But enough. I remember we at the wings among them the composer himself, and they rushed in their effusive way to congratulate her. She thought at first it was irony, but there was no mistaking the tone in which they told her that she had been superb. In the next scene the same sickening sense of disparity between aim and achievement was beginning to fall upon her when she was revived by the encouraging sotto-voce of Hamlet: 'Very fine!' 'splendid!' 'Go on!' Here, in fact, and all through the opera, the children of the French came out. From the highest to the lowest every one tried to keep her in heart with these generous encouragements. The wicked king forgot his wickedness for a moment to murmur: 'Courage.' The despairing queen assured her in the interludes of musical introspection that her voice was charming, and the very ballet girls who lamented around her in her mad scene said: 'Très bien mademoiselle.'

It was a two-fold triumph for not only did Miss Griswold sing as we have seen, but her singing matched her voice. Her eyes seemed to draw their light from inner fires, her attitude and gesture were a virtuous study of despair. When she tottered off the stage to her loge pursued as it were by the applause from the outside of the great curtain, she found the old composer ready to fall over her forgiveness for this interpretation which had brought back to him in all its freshness the sweetest poetic vision of his prime. A more beautiful triumph was in store when she reached the room where her mother sat. Her uncle, Bret Harte, who had come all the way from Glasgow for the performance took his turn next. 'I knew you had learned to sing,' he said, 'but where did you learn to act.' The position was consumed. The next day the papers said the only thing about it they could say. The judges had spoken and where the public speaks with sufficient determination the papers will be sure to follow. It is a trade secret, and I do not know that I ought to let it out. There were indeed, one or two carping exception, but they have only served to emphasize the large majorities of the triumph. One gentleman discovered that the French was not absolutely pure, thus letting his judgment on the question of morals by default, and another gentleman was almost sure that somewhere or other in the third act, and some time or other between 10 and 11 he had heard a half quarter of a note which was not quite to his liking. There is really nothing much more remarkable on the dark side of history than the victories won on the minor scale. The day before the debutante in question was nothing—a little girl coming to take lessons. The day after she has her choice of attention from all the most distinguished in society and in public life. Soon after that she closed night Miss Griswold and her mother were at Gounod's house by invitation, and the great composer was playing to her and talking to her with that mixture of sarcastic inspiration and boyish frankness which is all his own. He was in fact, trying his court in the most assiduous fashion to induce her to take the chief part in an oratorio which he has written for the Birmingham Festival and to appear as Gretchen in the approaching revival of his Faust—and all this within one short month of absolute obscurity. Truly a great voice is a fine thing but there is one thing finer, and that is the heart of a hero in the breast of a debutante.

DAILY GAZETTE.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 7, 1881.

A PLEASANT OCCASION.

Presentation of Statuary to a Manitou Hostess

To the Editor of the GAZETTE:

One of the conditions that make success possible in conducting a hotel is the having, at the head of the domestic department a competent lady. That the guests at the Barker house, Manitou, felt themselves highly favored in this regard was shown on Saturday evening last, when there occurred, at that house one of those pleasant events which tend to strengthen the friendly ties between hostess and guests. The lady guests of the house had purchased for Mrs. Barker one of the most beautiful and elegant of Rogers' group of statuary, and arranged for its presentation on that evening. The box containing the statuary arrived about eight o'clock and was carried into the office, where all the ladies were summoned. When all were present Mrs. Barker was invited to. Her usually more than pleasant countenance was slightly clouded with an expression of surprise, as thoughts of a possible (?) indignation meeting of some dyspeptic guests flashed through her mind, but these were immediately dispelled as she was shown a large box in the center of the office surrounded by the ladies. A card on the box bore her address and she was asked to open it. This done, its contents were exposed to the astonished recipient. The piece is called 'Weighing the Baby,' and is too familiar to need any description.

The presentation was quite informal, Mrs. Barker being like all who rise from her tables, "too full for utterance" and could only remark that the preparations preceding this presentation had been conducted in a most mysterious manner, but as all things mysterious would be explained in the future, she would wait for an explanation of this occurrence. She thanked the ladies most heartily. Neither Mr. nor Mrs. Barker spare any pains to make their house the pleasantest family resort in Manitou and this testimonial was but a slight expression on the part of the ladies of their appreciation of all the kindness and the efforts to make their summer home a delightful one.

I might add that the gentlemen who were allowed to linger on the outskirts and look on felt that they had been slighted in not being allowed to take part and testify to their regard for their hostess. A GUEST.

THE CAPITAL QUESTION

Pueblo in Favor of a Southern Convention.

The Pueblo Daily News of the 25th inst takes up the question of holding a convention of those in favor of the placing of the capital south of the Divide, and reports as follows: Yesterday being Sunday a newspaper representative had in abundance of time and leisure to circulate among the people of the Pueblos and hear their expressions and views on the subject of locating the state capital, and the preliminary steps to be taken in the premises. Twenty prominent men—men whose opinions have weight, were button holed on either side of the river and chatted about the matter, and all were unanimous in saying that a convention should be held immediately at some central point of easy access to all counties south of the Divide, with a view of settling upon some one point as a suitable location. The prevailing idea is that delegates to this convention should go pledged to support and stand by any city that may be chosen by a majority in the convention. Harmony must prevail, plain business propositions must be looked at as they exist without prejudice or partiality, and by energetic work it is conceded by all, even Denver itself, that the capital can be located south of the Divide and nearest the centre of the commonwealth, where it should be. Among the papers that are urging the necessity of placing the capital south of the Divide are the Colorado Springs GAZETTE, the Cañon City Reporter, the San Juan Prospector, the Rosita Journal, the Silver Cliff and Trinidad press, the Chieftain and Daily News. Those papers north of the Divide who are anxious for a square deal all around, and who are inclined favorably toward removing the capital from its present location, are the Leadville Democrat, the Carbonate Camp, Leadville, the Greeley Sun and the Golden Transcript. The latter paper says: "The Arapahoe county (Denver) assessment will lose hundreds of votes to Denver for the permanent capital. The people of the outside counties can stand a heap of besmearing, but they don't like to have it rubbed in." Jefferson, Boulder and Weld counties also have grievances, and very just ones too, it seems, which they are charging up against Denver in this contest. And so it will be clearly seen that all Southern Colorado will have to do to insure success is to promptly organize and work for the desired end. The Sierra (Trinidad) Journal says: "With all deference we suggest that Mayor Richmond, of Pueblo, and Mayor France, of Colorado Springs, give this matter their immediate attention. Let our people be up and doing."

MEASURING FLOWING WATER

How the State Engineer Gets at the Contents of the Poudre.

The Fort Collins Express gives the following interesting account of how the amount of water passing a given point in a river per second is computed. "Mr. Green, the state engineer, has stretched three lines across the Poudre river, making the distance from the upper to the lower line one hundred feet. On these three lines he has placed tags, four feet apart clear across the river, so that the distance to any point can be easily and quickly read. Then surface floats are thrown in above the lines, and, as they float down, the distance from the shore is called as the float passes each line. The exact time that it takes the float to traverse the one hundred feet is also taken. The same method is used with deep water floats. By this means the exact amount of water passing a point per second can be easily determined. The depth of the water in the river was taken at the commencement of the work, and measurements of the stage of water are taken each day, and complete records of these are kept."

MANITOU NOTES.

A Stormy Day Dampens Pleasures Somewhat

Mr. Charles A. Foster, proprietor of the Manitou Park hotel was a guest at the Manitou house yesterday. He says that it has been raining at the Park for the past few days.

Should the weather prove to be clear and pleasant today from 11 to 1 people will leave the Manitou house for the Park. This is about the average number set to the Park every day.

Colonel Phil. Sheridan leaves the Manitou house to morrow for Cheyenne where he will be joined by General Sickett and proceed thence on a general tour of inspection of the various army posts.

Mrs. F. W. Hilley wife of the well known Leadville and Deadwood mine owner was among the arrivals at the Beebee house yesterday.

Messrs. I. I. Brown, of Santa Fe, and Edward W. Lytle, of Las Vegas, both prominently connected with New Mexican mining interests came up from the south on afternoon express yesterday and are guests at the Beebee.

The stormy and disagreeable weather of the past two days has diminished the crowd at Manitou, although all of the hotels are still comfortably filled.

Dr. J. L. Thorn, of Kansas City, whose family has been at the Cliff House for some time returned yesterday from an extended trip through the Southern country.

Col. J. P. Sevinson, a leading Denver attorney, left his autograph on the Beebee house register yesterday.

Mr. G. W. Brown, one of Denver's wealthy and influential citizens is a guest at the Beebee.

Morran's renowned picture of the Mountain of the Holy Cross will be on exhibition at Dr. Bell's residence this afternoon for the benefit of St. Andrew's chapel.

Quite a number of the guests at the Manitou hotels will join the M. E. church excursion to the Grand cañon to-morrow morning.

Mr. Joseph M. Kearney, an extensive coal dealer of Cincinnati, is at the Manitou house for the season.

The regular Tuesday evening German was indulged in by the guests of the several hotels at the Saratoga last evening but owing to the stormy weather the attendance was not as large as usual.

Dr. S. S. Fisk of Poncha Springs took dinner at the Beebee yesterday.

Mr. A. Hutchinson is practicing for a pedestrian match to take place at Manitou next week.

READING AND MUSIC.

The Approaching Entertainment in the Opera House

The entertainment to be given next Saturday evening by Mrs. Laura Dainty and Madame Rita, in the Opera House, will be one of the pleasantest of the season. Madame Rita is a well known and popular artist, whose residence in this city has given the people frequent opportunities of enjoying her singing. Mrs. Dainty has won the admiration of the east and has secured the enthusiastic encomiums of both press and people. The Louisville Courier-Journal thus speaks of Mrs. Dainty:

The readings of that charming little lady, Mrs. Laura E. Dainty, attracted quite an audience at Library hall last night. The selections for the evening were mostly humorous. A few of a grave nature were thrown in to show that the reader was at home in this line of readings. She has a keen sense of the ridiculous, evidently. Tom's Little Star was a neat bit of elocution. "Christmas at the Quarters," negro dialect selection, was excellently delivered. "A Very Naughty Little Girl's View of Life" was the comic gem of the evening and brought down the house. "Death of the Old 'Squire" and "How the Old Horse Won the Bet" were strongly rendered. The audience was highly pleased with Mrs. Dainty, for she has dramatic fire, graceful manner and a most winning voice.
